ABSTRACT

A method for increasing performance of a multicast network is disclosed in which a server multicasts packets to a master client and at least one passive client. Aspects of the present invention include determining, by the clients during the multicast transfer, which is a slowest client based on which client drops a highest number of packets, and making the slowest client the master client, thereby adaptively determining which client becomes the master client to minimize network traffic.

5